Abortion Motherhood And Mental Health

Currently, two doctors must state that a woman's health is threatened for abortion to be recommended and risks to mental health are used to justify over 90% of British abortions. Almost every British abortion, therefore, emphasises the mental health danger of childbirth. While it may be accepted that women seeking abortion are strong, the justification for those abortions pervasively emphasises the supposed diminished ability of women to cope with childbirth.

In Abortion, Motherhood, and Mental Health, Ellie Lee adds another significant dimension to our understanding of the medicalization of reproduction, arguing that the experience of mothering is increasingly viewed as risky to women's mental health. . . . The book will be of interest to sociologists of medicine as yet another finely detailed examination of the seemingly relentless march of medicalization in which ever-larger swaths of human experience become pathologized and thus subject to ...
